

New Squirrel Stoves From Morsø Warm You Up This Winter

New for 2008, Morsø have introduced two designs in to the Squirrel family – the 1412 and 1442. Both wood burning stoves offer an environmentally sound way of heating your home and have been approved by DEFRA for use in smokeless areas. This means that you can happily burn wood, and other approved fuels, without the worry of emitting particulate-heavy emissions in to the atmosphere.

Featuring the classic Morsø stove attributes such as a solid, cast iron structure and secure glass-fronted door along with excellent efficiency, these new Squirrel models are a great addition to the range and perfect for heating smaller rooms. The Squirrel 1412 is a standard radiant stove featuring the famous Squirrel embossed side panels and 100mm legs as standard.

The Squirrel 1442, which features ribbed side panels, is a convector model with a natural convection design that helps to emit even warmth throughout the room. Both stoves have a nominal heat output of 5kW.

In addition to the features that make the Squirrel series so perfect for efficiently heating small spaces, the stoves have great green credentials being both approved by DEFRA and awarded the Nordic Swan Eco label. This award recognises both the environmentally friendly attributes of the stoves but also the fact that the environment is considered during production and packaging. In fact wood burning stoves are amongst some of the greenest ways to heat your home.

Karsten Aagaard, Head of Product Development at Morsø, explains that, 'Wood burning stoves are a great option for those concerned about burning our limited reserves of coal, oil and natural gas, as it is the only type of fuel that is replenishable.

Burning wood is referred to as being 'carbon-neutral', meaning that burning wood produces the same amount of carbon dioxide as if it were left to rot naturally on the forest floor. It means that wood burnt in this way does not contribute to the greenhouse effect unlike fossil fuels.'

The Squirrel 1412 costs £780 and the Squirrel 1442 costs £1,064. Please call 01788 554412 or visit www.morsoe.com/uk for further information.
